Mr. Greenwood Tells All

By MART BAILEY

"FORTUNATELY," said Good Old Bumpy, "you didn't shoot our chum Gilholy. But you did give him a scare. He's been under cover ever since."

"Where?"

Good Old Bumpy gave Jack Beerymore a look. "Never mind."

There followed a minute of silence, during which Good Old Bumpy, studying the actor as he finished two charcoal steaks and began working on the roast duck, wondered whether that dejected brow was due to contrition for having shot at a pal—or lamentation over his poor marksmanship. "Tell me more," he said at last.

Jack Beerymore didn't waste time looking up from the first food he had tasted in three days. "Butsy Ratsoff and his gorillas stayed in their armored limousine while I lay in ambush among the hedges and caterpillars," he mumbled. "I knew I wouldn't have long to wait, because Don had telephoned earlier, saying he would leave for the theater in about an hour. Well, you know what happened when Don finally appeared on the stoop. What with poor visibility and all that—" Jack shrugged. "Before I had emptied my automatic Butsy and his mob sped away, and Don Gilholy ran back into his house, slamming the door behind him. Since there was no sense in my hanging around, I ran home—where it occurred to me that I had to get away and change my identity. You see, if I had shot Don, the police would be after me; if I hadn't, then Butsy Ratsoff would be around to see that I did a better job on Don the next time. So I put on the makeup you saw tonight, and, throwing a few armfuls of extra makeup in the trunk for luck, came here."

"As the Hunchback of Notre Dame."

"No. As Greenwood."

"The cemetery?"

Jack Beerymore shuddered. "No wonder the name sounded familiar."

"Well, you can't go around in wigs and false beards for the rest of your natural life."

"That occurred to me, too. I guess you'll have to put me up at your place on the Shore Road for a while."

Good Old Bumpy considered for a long moment. "Do you still intend to keep your bargain with Ratsoff?"

Jack pursed his lips pensively. "Maybe if I could get another shot at Don—"

"Listen," interrupted Good Old Bumpy. "If you want my help, you must promise to drop the whole affair and do as I say. Understand?"

"You mean I can't even plug him through the arm?"

Good Old Bumpy shook his head sternly.

"Not even in the leg—or perhaps some less vital spot, so Ratsoff would get the impression that I meant business?"

"Not even in the leg."

Jack Beerymore frowned, as if to say what were friends for, anyway? "Well—all right," he agreed.

"Then that's settled. You can come home with me. But, remember, I won't be responsible."

"Responsible for what?"

"Don Gilholy's at my place. He hasn't said so, but he may have recognized you that night. He may not take the big, broad view of your taking potshots at him."

"He didn't recognize me," said the Perfect Profile. "The night was too foggy. As I said before, the visibility was terrible."

"Then let's pack."

In response, the actor pulled the trunk out from under the bureau and threw it on the bed. "If Butsy Ratsoff recognized me under the hunchback makeup, I'd better change my disguise. Perhaps you'd better glue on a set of whiskers, too."

BIG SHOT

The invitation was unnecessary. Good Old Bumpy had already opened the trunk and was probing among the jumble of false noses, teeth, toupees, beards, and miscellaneous nicknacks. He selected an ancient Greek helmet which Jack Beerymore had worn as Mercury in a satire that still smarted the executive ears of several telegraph companies.

The helmet was a tight fit, but he managed to squeeze it down over his large head. Abandoning the attempt to pry his ears under the iron rim, he glued a black Gay Nineties moustache under his bumpy nose, and surveyed the effect in the bureau mirror.

Happening to glance down, he spied an oblong box of red tooled leather lying in an open drawer. "Forgetting this?" he asked Jack Beerymore.

The actor whistled, "I was!" He lifted the box from the drawer and snapped back the cover, revealing a coil of crystals scintillating on purple velvet. "It's a diamond necklace," he explained, reverently passing the box to his friend.

Good Old Bumpy started. "You haven't taken up this underworld business professionally?"

"No. . . . The necklace belongs to Beatrice, and I must be very careful of it. The very first night it was in my possession a young thug with a squeaky voice held me up in front of my own house. Fortunately, I had stopped in Genalo's Paradise Grill for a Paradise Fizz and left the necklace behind, wrapped in a candy box. Apollo returned it to me the next day. It's an heirloom, priceless, and all that. The clasp broke the other night while Beatrice and I were dancing, and I offered to have it repaired."

"Beatrice?"

"Yes. Miss Thornrose. She plays the feminine lead in my new play."

"But I thought your fiance—Dolores What's-Her-Name—was playing the lead?"

Pain flitted across the actor's countenance, as if those words had salted a fresh wound. "Please don't mention that name again," said Jack Beerymore. "She isn't my fiancee. Our engagement was broken off the afternoon Beatrice embraced me in the wings during rehearsal. Beatrice only wanted to practice the curtain scene where the beautiful heiress returns the love of the young crook, who turns out to be the kidnapped child of her father's best friend. Beatrice wanted to be prepared in case anything happened to Dolores and she had to take over the role of the beautiful heiress. A really kind thought, but Dolores couldn't see it that way and resigned from the cast. Imagine, only three days before the opening. Luckily, Beatrice is clever and intelligent, as well as beautiful, and she learned the lines quickly. Everything would have been all right if Ratsoff and his gorillas hadn't come around."

"So you and Dolores have broken off?" mused Good Old Bumpy, performing a minor miracle by lighting a cigarette without singeing the big black moustache. "Too bad!"

"It isn't!" Nervously, the actor cocked his head, listening intently. "Thought I heard somebody outside the door," he explained. "For Pete's sake, don't make me talk so loud."

"Sorry." Lifting the necklace to the light, Good Old Bumpy squinted through the cigarette smoke at the diamonds. "Worth all of ten dollars, eh?" he said.

Jack Beerymore had succeeded in pulling a striped, turtle-neck sweater over his chest. He snorted. "Worth two hundred and fifty thousand, Beatrice says. Though its sentimental value, of course, is much more."

Good Old Bumpy returned the jewel box to the dresser. "Known this Beatrice long?"

"Sure. About a week and a half."

"That long, eh? Say, what are you supposed to be?"

Jack Beerymore grinned behind a bushy set of red whiskers, tilted his blue beret, and, clicking his heels together, executed a few steps of the hornpipe.

"A Lascar sailor," he replied. "Or maybe a Basque woodchopper. I don't know which."

"What would a Basque woodchopper be doing in this neighborhood?"

"Search me! But you'd be more likely to meet one of them than whatever you're supposed to be."

The actor's grin disappeared behind the bushy whiskers. He appeared to be listening for some elusive sound. "Did you hear somebody come up the stairs?" he asked Good Old Bumpy.

"Yes," replied that young man with a cheerful twirl of his Gay Nineties moustache. "Maybe it's Butsy Ratsoff."

SKYMAN

By Opdyke Whitney

WELL, THERE SHE IS, UNCLE PETER, THE OLD WING WITH THE NEW LOOK! NOW, WHAT'S THE EXPERT'S OPINION?

THIS SO-CALLED "EXPERT" IS SPEECHLESS, ALLAN! YOU'VE PERFORMED AN ENGINEERING MIRACLE!

RETURNING TO EARTH, FOLLOWING THE VENUSIAN VENTURE, SKYMAN FINDS THE FABULOUS "WING" WRECKED, VICTIM OF THE FURY OF A FREAK STORM.... NOW, AFTER WEEKS OF BACK-BREAKING WORK, SKYMAN, AS ALLAN TURNER, FINALLY UNVEILS THE REMODELED, STREAMLINED SKY SHIP....

THE "MIRACLE" STILL LACKS A FEW MINOR PARTS WHICH I'LL HAVE TO PICK UP IN TOWN. WANT TO DRIVE IN WITH ME?

IF YOU DON'T MIND, I'LL STAY BEHIND AND BROWSE ABOUT THE WING AWHILE!

LOOK AT HIM -- HE'S AS THRILLED AS A TWO YEAR OLD TYKE WITH A NEW TOY!

BIG SHOT

LATER, IN A DOWNTOWN SECTOR OF THE CITY....

OOPS! LIGHT CHANGED-- THAT'S ONE ADVANTAGE OF WANDERING ABOUT IN THE WING-- NO RED SIGNALS UP IN THE BLUE YONDER AND NO ---

PEDESTRIANS!
OH-OH---

EEEEEEK!

WOW, SHE REALLY TAGGED HIM! BETTER SEE IF I CAN LEND A HAND!

HE-HE STEPPED OFF THE CURB SUDDENLY! I COULDN'T STOP-I-I--

SAY, SHE'S BEVERLY HILLS, THE COSMETIC HEIRESS! SHE'S SURE INHERITED A MESS OF TROUBLE THIS TIME!

LET ME THROUGH PLEASE--I'M A PHYSICIAN!

HE'S IN PRETTY BAD SHAPE, DOCTOR!

AN AMBULANCE ARRIVES AND...

WE'LL RUSH HIM RIGHT TO THE HOSPITAL! THANKS FOR THE HELPING HAND, FRIEND!

HM-M LOOKS LIKE MY HELPING HANDS GOT A BIT BLOODY--- HEL-LO, THIS ISN'T BLOOD!

BIG SHOT.

ALONE, IN THE LOCKED GARAGE, ALLAN STIRS SLOWLY AND ...

WH - WHEN, THEY REALLY GAVE ME A GOING OVER -- SMELL MONOXIDE FUMES -- MUST BE LOCKED IN THE GARAGE!

NO TIME TO FOOL WITH LOCKED DOORS! I BETTER BUST OUT IN THIS BUGGY FIRST AND ASK QUESTIONS LATER!

CRASH

LOOKS LIKE THE BOYS BORROWED MY CAR TO BOOT! PROBABLY RACING OUT TO THE HILLS ESTATE RIGHT NOW, FOR THE PHONEY FINALE TO THEIR SHAKEDOWN SCHEME!

A HALF HOUR LATER ...

FORTUNATELY, THE ROAD TO THE HILLS PLACE RUNS RIGHT PAST THE SKYDROME. NOW I CAN BE IN THE WING WHEN THOSE THUGS STAGE THEIR LAST ACT!

MEANWHILE ...

SO THIS IS THE MURDERESS THAT TRIED TO KILL MY "BROTHER," EH!

EASY NOW, "MR. FRANKLIN," WE REALIZE HOW UPSET YOU MUST BE! I'M SURE MISS HILLS WILL BE HAPPY TO SETTLE THIS SCANDAL OUT OF COURT--FOR, AH-- SAY TWENTY THOUSAND DOLLARS!
